The Bill's package

- Jointly announced by the Minister for Education and the Minister for Employment, Skills, Small and Family Business on 19 June 2020.
- University students who study in 'job-relevant' areas, as selected by the Government, will pay less for their degrees.
- The Government has stated that this bill will incentivise students to make more job-relevant decisions about what they want to study.
- The Government will also provide $900 million for a National Priorities and Linkage fund to incentivise universities to produce 'job ready' graduates to meet the needs of local industries and employers.
- Students will pay less to study:
  - teaching, nursing, clinical psychology, English and languages (46% less)
  - agriculture and maths (62% less)
  - health, architecture, environmental science, IT and engineering (20% less)
- In August, adjustments were made to reduce student fees for social work and some psychology courses.
- Under this reform package, the cost of studying most humanities subjects at university will more than double.
- 'It means someone studying humanities or communications will be in the same fee bracket as law students' (ABC, 20 June 2020).
- Concerns have also been raised that humanities students will spend their entire careers paying for their debts.
- There are also concerns that students from diverse ethnic and socio-economic backgrounds will be forced, by economic necessity, to study only Government approved 'job ready' courses, leaving the students of wealthier backgrounds to fill humanities programs.
- While Universities Australia welcomed some parts of the reform package, it also stated that 'we will need to examine it closely... in order to understand the impact on our students including those in the humanities'.
- The Australian Academy of the Humanities raises several concerns with the package and states that 'The policy rationale for shifting students into areas that are 'job ready' or 'job-relevant' is disputed by the evidence from 2019 graduate outcomes data, that shows humanities graduates are in demand in sectors projected for substantial growth and outperform science and maths graduates in full-time employment and labour force participation'. (AAH Submission).
